

He made his greetings to the sedate maiden and was about to leave her when it occurred to him to ask her—in company with her young sister, of course—to accompany him to the play at some time during his visit to her town. It was all settled that he should set the time at a later date by phone, and all went well. Following this friendly call he had a date with another girl, oh, no different. Of course he got their telephone numbers mixed, and made the right remark to the wrong girl, and ever since he has been trying to make things right with the sedate one—his wife's friend.

There will be a rather good joke feature connected with the grand opera presentation at the Salt Lake theatre this week. The "mail order business" has put many of the regular first-nighters to the bad, and the stalls and other desirable places (with a few exceptions) are to be occupied by the out-of-town folk who were wise enough to believe the announcement, "first come, first served." Incidentally, some of the gowns purchased for the event will adorn the galleries.

The patron saint who long since drove the snakes out of Ireland has been a veritable blessing locally the past few days. He supplied new ideas in the way of decorations for sundry and various social affairs, which otherwise would have been driven to "the same old story in the same old way," "red and green," "spring flowers," "national colors," "valentines," etc., etc., ad infinitum. The perpetual verdure of the Isle itself is refreshing after the social world has run the gamut of the seasons in the matter of decorations.

The maiden has always been rather timid, but just enough so to add other charms—which, by the way, are numerous. Recently, in company with her sister, she has been sleeping in a folding bed, one of those tall contrivances which have to be pulled down before they can be put to any use. What was the sister's amazement the other evening to see the maiden in question stoop and take her usual look under the bed before she could make up her mind to get in.

And now the Salt Lake friends of the maiden are anxiously awaiting still another announcement of marriage from the coast. The girl, who has grown up since the family left Zion, is said to be one of the handsomest, and the wedding, when it does come, will be of interest to many locally.

The only large event scheduled for the coming week is the musicale to be given Thursday afternoon by Mrs. Lee Charles Miller for Miss Edna Bailey. Miss Bailey, who has just returned from a long period of study in the east, will be heard for the first time by her friends here.

There's a new sparkler on the third finger of her left hand, and she looks at it with that gaze of sheer devotion which a girl turns on thing else in the world. The date has not yet been set, it seems, but the affair is bound to come off soon.

A number of theatrical parties have been arranged for the St. Patrick's day concert tonight at the Salt Lake theatre. The affair being in the hands of Miss Nora Gleason, of course many of
